"Lee was an incarnation of moral character, outranking all the great leaders of the world. He was the supremest embodiment of moral force to be found among modern men. Character and self-sacrifice were the great keys to his life and fame. It was better for the South to have lost with Lee than to have won with some smaller man," said Mr. Wendling.

Lee took the blame at Gettysburg: at Chancellors-ville he gave the credit for victory to Jackson. Had the proper support been given him he would have won at Gettysburg.
